Udometer, first rain gauge in the world

By Yun Ki Song PT

There is a udometer the Korean ancestors invented and used to measure rainfall in the mid-15th century.

They attentively observed the rainfall for the purpose of doing farming well and solving the problem of water to suit the meteorological and climatic conditions of the country where it mainly got dryly and rainy in spring and summer respectively.

In the period of Koryo (918-1392) they calculated the rainfall by measuring how deep the rainwater penetrated into soil after it rained. But such depth was different according to the nature of soil and other factors. Therefore, it was impossible to accurately measure the absolute amount of rain.

In consideration of that, the udometer, which was 40cm in height and 16cm in diameter, was invented in August 1441 during the period of the feudal Josen dynasty (1392-1910). Later, in the course of using it, an improved version was made, which was 30cm high and 14cm across.

The device was in the shape of a cylinder and put on a stone stand.

Such devices were put in the yards of central and local government offices. The feudal government made it a rule for every county to report to their province the times when rain started and stopped and the amount of rain and for every province to submit the data to Soungwan which collected and recorded all the data.

The udometer, the world’s first rain gauge, is part of the cultural heritage associated with the creative talents of the Korean people.
